A.S.H. section and a Bass & Treble section. There are also two Gain knobs. The C.A.S.H. section is for adjusting the bass and treble. The Bass and Treble section is for fine tuning the low and high frequencies. The FG-X comes with a number of buttons.

One is for raising and lowering the volume. Another is for increasing and decreasing the bass gain. Another is for raising and lowering the treble. The other buttons are to change the volume of the three sections. There is also a line out jack for recording.

Of course, there is a headphone jack for listening to the mixes. You get three combinations of EQ. You can adjust the highs, mids, lows, and then balance the EQ. There are two controls for EQ to adjust the highs and the lows. There is also a blue and white indicator to show which EQ control is active. The software is mostly self-explanatory. You need to figure out the control layout before getting started. I found the software to be very user friendly. There are a lot of features and you can really do a lot with this thing. The most important thing is that it's small, light, and easy to transport. You can even take the FG-X on a plane and not worry about it. There are a lot of functions that are new and different. If you want to use it for mastering, this is your tool. If you just want to use it for listening, it's a good choice too. If you're not sure what you want to use it for, then you need to listen to as many different genres as you can. You might find that you like it for listening. Then you can decide what you want to do with it. The FG-X was recommended to me by a friend. I love the quality of the mixes that I can get from it. I'm not a big fan of the sounds in the DAWs, but the FG-X makes the records sound great. I will probably use this on my next mix. The Fine Print: I received this for free to review from Funk Zone. All opinions are my own. The last time I reviewed a component was about five years ago. It was an Artisan SII. It was an amazing piece of equipment. I loved that the SII was so small and light.
